ANNEXURE A

ROLES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF CTU TRAINING SOLUTIONS

1. Hold discussions with the host company partner and find out about host company's needs and the number of learners that could be accommodated. Discuss how the "balance" between service and learning could best be maintained and how the necessary preparations and logistics could be done.
2. Work at balancing the needs of the host company partner and the learners and adjust their expectations as the implementation progresses.
3. If learners need to demonstrate a certain level of "readiness" for participation in the WIL programme how this will be assessed. If possible, involve the learners in their own self-assessment based on solid criteria they have some control over.
4. Pay special attention to the explanation of how the content goals or learning outcomes of the course and WIL relate to each other. Then, ask learners to respond by telling you exactly what they think they will be accomplishing during their involvement in the WIL activities of the module.
5. Determine the time learners will be expected to spend completing the WIL component of their course work. Give the learners an estimate of total time the WIL component will take and assist them in developing realistic time frames.
6. Allow enough time for learners to participate in structured discussions about their experiences in the WIL programme, and to relate their experiences to the readings and other course material. Also create opportunities for them to reflect on their experiences in writing and apply problem-solving thinking regarding challenges they encounter in the early stages of their WIL responsibilities.
7. Find ways to involve learners in setting their own learning outcomes (goals) and participating in the assessment of those outcomes. Requiring learners to invest in this activity increases their sense of accountability to and ownership of the process and product of WIL.
8. Check in with the host company partners often, otherwise they might assume that you are automatically aware of certain issues which should be brought to your attention.
9. Allow the learners to have regular and direct contact with you; do not assume that they would just form their teams and then go out and work independently on their community service-learning project. They will need your guidance and support throughout.

ANNEXURE B

ROLES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE HOST COMPANY

1. Remember that the learners do not only want to help meet company needs that were identified by the company but also have to utilize their WIL experience as the basis for their understanding of the course material and receive academic credit for learning through their efforts.
2. Help learners think about what experience means to them and encourage them as they explore larger organizational and societal implications.
3. Provide an orientation for your organization which could include the following:
 - A tour of the facilities and an introduction to the staff.
 - A review of rules, safety regulations, policies, dress codes, time-keeping requirements and other pertinent information.
 - A discussion of the learners' roles, including specific company expectations.
 - A description of the "larger picture": why you do what you do, and how the learners' contributions fit in.
 - A review of skills needed to complete the WIL.
 - An explanation of any jargon or site-specific language used by company partners.
4. Keep the learners' full schedules in mind and provide them with specific and reliable information about the expected number of working hours, times and days of the week they are expected to work, as well as advanced notice of schedule changes if possible.
5. Stay involved and remember that you are truly a partner in the learners' education and that learners will benefit tremendously from your guidance throughout all phases of the WIL programme. They will also appreciate regular feedback on their efforts, and acknowledgement of work well done.
6. Keep CTU Training Solutions informed of any concerns, successes, or other issues related to the WIL activities. Concerns should be communicated immediately so that you and your CTU Training Solutions partner can resolve issues that might have a negative impact on the learners or the programme.
7. Please make yourself available to assist the lecturer with learner assessment (if required) and with evaluation of the WIL activities for purposes of future improvement.
